Literature

Luis Seoane, Pascin, Editorial Poseidon, Buenos Aires, 1944, 1st ed., no. 25, p. 64 (illustrated and titled Mujer Desmuda Tendida)

Y. Hemin, G. Krogh, K. Perls and A. Rambert, Pascin: Catalogue Raisonné, Peintures, Aquarelles, Pastels, Dessins, Paris, 1984, vol. 1, p. 303, no. 597 (illustrated)

Throughout his career, his most frequent subject was the female body, often depicted in casual poses, nude or partly dressed. Returning to Paris in 1922, Pascin and his wife rented a studio in Montmartre and became friends with artists such as Marc Chagall and Amedeo Modigliani. His models were the local dancer girls and prostitutes and Pascin soon became an icon of the bohemian community inheriting the sobriquet 'The Prince of Montparnasse'. Throughout the 1920s the artist produced a series of fleetingly rendered oil paintings, depicting "petite filled" waiting for their clients and models anticipating the end of their sitting. The model depicted here, Rebecca, is one of his most recurring sitters.
